The Skunk Ape—Florida's Sasquatch

By Pete Magnani, Publisher

When most people picture Sasquatch, they imagine the Pacific Northwest—mist-covered forests, snowcapped mountains, and alpine rivers. Florida offers a different setting for its legendary wild man: flooded cypress forests, tangled mangroves, sawgrass marshes, and humid nights filled with unfamiliar sounds.

Known as the Skunk Ape, Florida's answer to Bigfoot is said to be a large, hair-covered creature that walks upright and gives off a powerful, unpleasant odor. Although no scientific evidence has established that such an animal exists, reports of mysterious creatures in Florida's wilderness have circulated for generations, evolving into one of the state's most enduring legends.

Folklore in the Florida Wilderness

Some modern retellings connect the Skunk Ape with Esti Capcaki, commonly translated as "tall man" or "hairy man" and attributed to Seminole or Muscogee tradition. Popular versions portray this figure as a powerful inhabitant or guardian of the wilderness. That connection should be treated cautiously. Although Indigenous cultures have rich oral traditions involving the natural and spiritual worlds, historical documentation does not clearly establish Esti Capcaki as an ancient version of today's Skunk Ape. Much of that interpretation comes from modern cryptozoology—the study of animals whose existence has not been scientifically verified.

Did You Know

REMEMBERING A LEGEND The Indian Rocks Beach fishing community is remembering longtime charter captain and tournament fisherman David Scott "Captain Dave" Mistretta, who died unexpectedly August 12th at age 64.

Mistretta spent more than four decades fishing the Gulf and became a familiar figure throughout Tampa Bay. As owner and captain of Jawstoo Fishing Charters, he introduced thousands of customers to Gulf fishing while building an accomplished tournament career with the Jawstoo Pro Team.

His son and longtime fishing partner, Captain David John Mistretta, will continue operating Jawstoo Fishing Charters and carrying forward the family tradition.

PLAYGROUND UPGRADES Largo Central Park Playground is receiving several exciting upgrades, including new play areas designed for children of different ages. The updated playground will feature sections for children ages 2–5 and 5–12, along with a brand-new area designed for children ages 6 months–2 years. While the playground remains closed during renovations, Largo Central Park's other amenities, trails, and event spaces remain open to the public.

The improvements will enhance one of Largo's most popular family destinations. Largo Central Park welcomes more than one million visitors each year and hosts dozens of major events and celebrations.

The upgraded playground will include a new adventure area with two towers standing more than 20 feet tall, connected by a tunnel for climbing, exploring, and imaginative play. It will also feature Ninja Course 3, inspired by American Ninja Warrior, with 21 obstacles along a 91-foot course, including a rock wall and the fan-favorite warped wall. Additional enhancements include fresh artificial turf with colorful red, green, and blue play zones, two additional playground gates, and a communication board displaying photos, symbols, and illustrations to support individuals with autism spectrum disorder or limited spoken-language abilities. Visit PlayLargo.com for updates.

MOSQUITO ALERT Pinellas County Mosquito Control is expanding efforts to reduce mosquito populations as more than 30 locally acquired cases of dengue fever have been confirmed in the Tampa Bay area. Pinellas County is currently under a mosquito-borne illness alert from the Florida Department of Health.

Dengue can spread when a mosquito bites an infected person and later transmits the virus to others. The mosquitoes that carry dengue are active during the day and can breed in as little as a bottle cap of water. They often lay eggs in buckets, toys, plant saucers, tires, and other household items found on private property.

Mosquito Control will continue daytime backpack fogging, daily surveillance and door-to-door inspections. Residents are encouraged to allow technicians to inspect their properties and eliminate potential breeding sites.

Residents should regularly empty standing water, wear light-colored, long-sleeved clothing and closed-toe shoes outdoors, and use a CDC-recommended insect repellent containing DEET, picaridin, IR3535, or oil of lemon eucalyptus.

Anyone who believes they may have a mosquito-borne illness should immediately contact the Florida Department of Health in Pinellas County at (727) 824-6932.

Still, the association reveals something important about the legend. Florida's swamps have long inspired reverence, uncertainty, and fear. Before roads, drainage projects, and development transformed much of the peninsula, enormous stretches of the interior remained difficult to explore. Stories about unknown beings naturally flourished in such places.

The Skunk Ape Takes Shape

Long before the Skunk Ape became a household name, Florida newspapers carried stories of mysterious "wild men" roaming the state's forests. During the late 19th and early 20th centuries, hunters, turpentine workers, and cattlemen reported large, shaggy figures moving through remote swamps. Most accounts were dismissed as escaped circus animals, bears seen in poor light, or frontier storytelling. Yet they established a tradition that later merged with national fascination following the 1967 Patterson-Gimlin film in California.

By the 1950s and 1960s, Florida newspapers increasingly referred to the creature as the "Skunk Ape," distinguishing it from its western cousin. Residents of the Everglades, Big Cypress, and the Green Swamp swapped stories of nighttime screams, enormous footprints, and an overpowering odor.

Reports became especially common during the 1960s and 1970s, as Florida's population surged and development pushed into rural areas. Newspapers carried accounts of tall, apelike figures near roads, citrus groves, canals, and wooded neighborhoods. Witnesses frequently described dark or reddish-brown hair, unusually long arms, and an ability to disappear quickly into heavy vegetation.

The creature's most memorable characteristic was its smell. Witnesses compared the odor to a skunk, wet animal, rotten eggs, or decaying vegetation. That detail distinguished the Skunk Ape from the better-known Bigfoot and gave Florida's creature a suitably swampy identity.

None of these reports produced scientific evidence. No body, verified biological sample, or conclusive photograph emerged. Nevertheless, the stories attracted the attention of law enforcement officers, newspaper reporters, and state legislators, helping cement the Skunk Ape as an enduring Florida folk legend.

Tallahassee Takes Notice

One of the strangest chapters in the legend is preserved in Florida's official records. In 1978, state Rep. Hugh Paul Nuckolls introduced House Bill 58, sometimes called the "Florida Skunk Ape Protection Act." The proposal sought to protect unspecified "anthropoids or humanoid animals" from capture or harm.

The bill did not pass, and its introduction did not represent official recognition of the creature. Even so, the surviving 24-page legislative file demonstrates how firmly the Skunk Ape had entered Florida popular culture.

The Mystery of the Myakka Photographs

Interest surged again in December 2000, when the Sarasota County Sheriff's Office received an anonymous letter with two color photographs. The writer claimed that a large animal had entered her yard and taken apples from her porch. She believed it might have been an escaped orangutan.

The photographs show a bulky, reddish-haired figure crouching among saw palmettos, its eyes reflecting the camera's flash. They became known as the "Myakka Skunk Ape" photographs, although the photographer's identity and the location were never publicly confirmed.

Believers considered the photographs some of the clearest evidence of the creature's existence. Skeptics suggested that the subject could have been a person wearing a costume, a known primate, or part of a carefully staged hoax. Without the photographer, a physical specimen, or additional verifiable evidence, the images remain intriguing but inconclusive.

A Legend Finds a Home

Today, much of Florida's Skunk Ape culture centers on Ochopee, a tiny community along the Tamiami Trail. There, longtime enthusiast Dave Shealy operates the Skunk Ape Research Headquarters—part roadside attraction, part museum, and part celebration of Everglades folklore. Visitors can examine footprint casts, photographs, and sighting reports while purchasing souvenirs associated with Florida roadside tourism.

Mainstream zoology offers more ordinary explanations. Florida black bears can stand on their hind legs, while darkness and heavy vegetation can distort an animal's size and shape. Escaped exotic primates, hoaxes, and honest misidentifications may also account for some encounters. Most importantly, no verified bones, DNA, hair, or other physical evidence has demonstrated the existence of an unknown giant primate in Florida.

Yet the landscape makes disbelief feel a little less certain. Big Cypress National Preserve alone protects approximately 729,000 acres of rugged freshwater swamp. Nearby lie the Everglades, the Ten Thousand Islands, and vast stretches of mangrove forest, sawgrass marsh, and isolated hardwood hammocks.

It is a landscape filled with hidden waterways, dense vegetation, and places rarely visited by people. Under the right conditions—and perhaps with a little imagination—an ordinary shadow, distant animal, or unexplained sound can become something far more mysterious.

Whether the Skunk Ape is an undiscovered primate, a collection of mistaken identities, or one of Florida's greatest campfire stories, its place in the state's folklore is secure. Few legends capture the imagination like the possibility that something large and mysterious still moves through the cypress shadows of the Everglades.

In a state better known for beaches and theme parks, the Skunk Ape reminds us that Florida also contains one of North America's great remaining wildernesses—a place where mystery still feels possible. Perhaps that is why reports continue to surface: oversized footprints are photographed, strange cries are heard, and campers swear they glimpsed something disappearing into the palmettos before dawn.

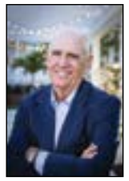
ARE TRUMP ACCOUNTS REALLY WORTH IT? YOU BET THEY ARE!

by Ray Ferrara, ProVise Management Group



The One Big Beautiful Bill Act introduced a new savings vehicle for children called a "Trump Account." While the name may draw attention, the real attraction is the opportunity to build significant long-term wealth through disciplined saving and investing.

Trump Accounts can be established for children under age 18. Parents, grandparents, and others may contribute up to $5,000 annually. Employers can contribute up to $2,500 per year on behalf of employees' children. These employer contributions count toward the annual limit, are generally tax-deductible to the company, avoid FICA taxes, and are not taxable income to the employee under federal law.

Perhaps the most appealing feature is the government's contribution. Children born between 1/1/25 and 12/31/28 receive a $1,000 starter deposit from the federal government. Contributions also receive favorable treatment for gift and generation-skipping transfer tax purposes, making them an attractive planning tool for grandparents and other family members.

The account is designed to encourage long-term investing. Funds generally cannot be withdrawn before age 18, except in limited circumstances such as excess contribution corrections, qualified rollovers, certain ABLE account transfers, or upon the beneficiary's death. At age 18, the account transitions into a traditional IRA.

If funded consistently, the growth potential can be substantial. Assuming a $6,000 initial contribution, including the government's $1,000 deposit, followed by annual contributions of $5,000 for the next 17 years, and assuming a hypothetical 7 percent annual return, the account could grow to approximately $173,000 by age 18.

The real opportunity may come after the conversion to a traditional IRA. A young adult in a relatively low tax bracket may gradually convert the account to a Roth IRA, paying little or no tax on portions sheltered by the standard deduction. Even after paying some taxes on larger conversions, the long-term benefits can be dramatic. In one hypothetical example, the account could grow to about $226,000 after completing a series of Roth conversions. Left invested at the same 7 percent return, it could exceed $4 million by age 65.

Of course, life rarely follows a perfect script. Yet even if some of the Roth IRA funds are eventually used for education, a first home, or other major life goals, Trump Accounts can provide young people with an extraordinary financial head start and a powerful foundation for future wealth.

CLEARWATER JAZZ HOLIDAY CELEBRATES 47 YEARS

Clearwater Jazz Holiday Powered by Duke Energy returns October 15th–18th, celebrating 47 years of live music on the waterfront in downtown Clearwater. The festival will once again feature Tampa Bay Times main stage concerts on the large green in Coachman Park, with two headline performances each night. This year's celebration also includes a free daily festival pre-party featuring live music on two side stages located in Coachman Park's Lower Plaza and Promenade Pier overlooking Clearwater Harbor before the headliners take the main stage each evening.

"We're excited to continue building on the Back to Our Roots format this year. It creates many unique ways for people to experience the festival in one of the most beautiful waterfront settings in the Bay Area," shares Steve Weinberger, Clearwater Jazz Holiday Foundation CEO. "There's something truly special about live music on Clearwater's waterfront in October."

From the side stages to the main stage, the 2026 lineup continues Clearwater Jazz Holiday's tradition of presenting a fun and musically diverse festival experience with distinct daily themes including Cool Jazz Thursday, Feel the Rhythm Friday, Blues & Brass Saturday, and Roots & Funk Sunday. Festivalgoers can enjoy music from two general admission areas where blankets and lawn chairs are welcome—the ticketed Green experience located behind reserved seating or the free and open Sunset Bluff overlooking the main stage and the waterfront. New for 2026 are stage-front VIP tables for four that include access to the festival's VIP Hospitality Area. Food and beverage vendors will serve festival attendees throughout Coachman Park during all four days of the event.

Reserved ticket options include several tiers of reserved seating as well as new stage-front VIP tables for four with VIP Hospitality Area access. Main Lawn General Admission tickets and free and open viewing areas on the Sunset Bluff provide additional ways to enjoy the festival experience. Single-Day and Discounted Multi-Day Packages are available. Free and open side stage performances take place daily before the main stage concerts begin. Buy tickets and view the full schedule at ClearwaterJazz.com.

Clearwater Jazz Holiday is presented by the Clearwater Jazz Holiday Foundation, a 501(c)(3) nonprofit organization which also celebrates the art form of jazz year-round with innovative jazz appreciation and instructional programs, online education resources, exciting performance opportunities, special funding, and creative learning experiences.

DATA CENTERS: OPPORTUNITY, IMPACT, AND FLORIDA'S GROWING DEBATE

Data centers are buildings filled with computer servers. They support cloud storage, streaming services, online shopping, government operations, and artificial intelligence. As people and businesses use more digital services, developers are looking for sites with dependable electricity, land, fast fiber connections, and favorable tax policies. That growth has started a debate across Florida.

Supporters say data centers are an important part of modern life. New facilities can create construction jobs, attract private investment, increase property-tax revenue, and help technology businesses grow. They also provide computing power used by hospitals, schools, companies, and government agencies. Supporters believe communities that welcome data centers could be better prepared for a technology-based economy.

Critics and local officials are concerned about the resources these facilities require. Large data centers can use enormous amounts of electricity, while some cooling systems need large amounts of water. Nearby residents may also worry about noise, diesel backup generators, environmental effects, and expensive utility upgrades. Communities must also decide whether the permanent jobs and tax revenue are worth the land and infrastructure a data center may require.

Florida lawmakers addressed some of these concerns this year. A new state law created requirements for large electricity customers and added water-permitting rules for large-scale data centers. The law calls for utility rates designed to place appropriate infrastructure costs on major power users. It also allows cities and counties to control where data centers may be built through local zoning and long-term development plans. Certain projects seeking large amounts of water must provide more information, and reclaimed water should be used when practical.

The issue has reached Pinellas County, where open land is scarce and homes and businesses are often close together. In Pinellas Park, American Tower proposed replacing a light-industrial building near Bryan Dairy Road with a data-processing facility measuring about 17,000 square feet. The company said the project would be a smaller operation, not an artificial-intelligence center. The application was later withdrawn.

In August 2026, the Pinellas Park City Council approved a one-year pause on new or expanded data centers. During that period, officials plan to study how the facilities could affect utilities, public safety, the environment, and nearby properties. The pause does not mean that future projects will automatically be approved or rejected.

Pinellas County commissioners have also directed staff to prepare a resolution explaining that large, stand-alone data centers are already prohibited in unincorporated areas because county zoning does not list them as an allowed use. That position would not apply inside the county's 24 municipalities, which set their own zoning rules.

For local residents, the debate centers on several questions: Where should data centers be located, who should pay for infrastructure improvements, and what protections should be required?

I'VE JUST MOVED TO FLORIDA. WILL MY OLD OUT-OF-STATE DOCUMENTS STILL WORK?

By Theodore Schofner, Esq.

Lots of people are moving into Tampa Bay. Many of you are wondering whether your out-of-state will, power of attorney, health care surrogate designation, or trust will still work here. Technically, Florida law will honor a last will and other advance directives that were properly signed and executed in another state. However, that is only a technical answer.

The practical problem occurs when you try to use those out-of-state documents at banks, hospitals, and local government offices. Tellers, nurses, caseworkers, and hospital administrators may be accustomed to seeing Florida documents, and an unfamiliar out-of-state document can create concerns, misunderstandings, headaches, and delays.

More serious problems can occur if an individual no longer has the capacity to execute a new Florida document, such as a power of attorney. In many cases, the client's former out-of-state attorney must be located and contacted to confirm that the document was properly executed, remains valid, and continues to be effective under that state's laws even though the client now lives in Florida and has lost capacity.

Be especially careful with an out-of-state power of attorney. A well-written power of attorney may mean the difference between obtaining benefits such as Medicaid and being unable to obtain them. Many out-of-state powers of attorney lack language allowing the attorney-in-fact or agent to establish a personal services contract, create a Qualified Income Trust, fund an asset protection trust, fund a pooled trust, or purchase an annuity for Medicaid asset protection. Most importantly, an out-of-state power of attorney may not grant the individual "superpowers" necessary to perform certain duties under Florida law.

The same considerations apply to trusts created in other states. It may be important to change a trust's venue and governing law to Florida so its administration can be simplified and handled consistently under Florida law.

What is my recommendation? If you have the time and resources, visit a qualified elder law attorney and obtain new Florida estate planning documents. This can help ensure that everything is properly addressed while reducing stress and misunderstandings when serious health or financial challenges arise.

The same logic applies if you are planning to leave Florida for retirement or to live closer to your children and grandchildren. After arriving in your new state, consider obtaining estate planning documents prepared under that state's laws. These are critical documents that can control your assets, finances, health care, and decision-making. In short, we recommend maintaining estate planning documents prepared for the jurisdiction where you currently live.

You can reach Theodore Schofner, Esq. at the Schofner Law Firm, 2117 Indian Rocks Road S. in Largo, (727) 588-0290.

CAN PROBIOTICS HELP MANAGE BLOOD SUGAR?

Probiotics are commonly promoted for digestive health, but researchers are also examining whether they can help manage blood sugar. Findings are encouraging for adults with prediabetes or Type 2 diabetes, although probiotics cannot replace medication, exercise, or a healthy diet.

Probiotics are live bacteria or yeasts found in fermented foods and dietary supplements. They may influence the collection of microorganisms in the digestive tract, known as the gut microbiome. The microbiome may affect blood sugar by influencing inflammation, insulin sensitivity, the intestinal barrier, and how the body processes nutrients.

Recent reviews of clinical trials suggest that probiotic or synbiotic supplements may produce modest improvements in blood sugar. Synbiotics combine probiotics with prebiotics, which are fibers that feed beneficial intestinal bacteria.

A 2025 review of 48 studies found small improvements among people with prediabetes or Type 2 diabetes. On average, fasting blood sugar dropped by about seven points, while A1c—a measure of average blood sugar over two to three months—fell by about one-third of a percentage point. Other research found slightly greater improvements, but the overall evidence remains limited.

Results vary because researchers have tested different types and amounts of probiotics for different periods. Products containing Lactobacillus and Bifidobacterium are among the most widely studied. Supplements containing several strains may provide greater benefits than single-strain products. However, researchers have not identified the best probiotic, dosage, or treatment period for managing blood sugar.

Probiotic products are not interchangeable. A benefit associated with one formulation does not mean every product labeled "probiotic" will produce the same result. Consumers should look for labels that identify individual strains and list the number of live organisms expected through the expiration date. Independent quality verification, such as a USP seal, may offer additional reassurance.

Food sources include yogurt, kefir, sauerkraut, kimchi, and other fermented products, although not every fermented food contains live probiotic cultures. People with diabetes should check nutrition labels because flavored yogurts, sweetened drinks, and similar products may contain considerable added sugar.

Probiotics usually cause only mild, temporary gas or bloating in healthy adults. People who are severely ill, immunocompromised, hospitalized, or using a central venous catheter should consult a physician before taking them.

For most people, probiotics are best viewed as a possible addition to established care—not a primary treatment. Prescribed medication, a high-fiber diet, regular exercise, adequate sleep, weight management, and appropriate medical care remain the foundations of blood sugar control. Because responses vary, tracking glucose readings can help patients discuss any noticeable changes with their physician or diabetes care team.

LITHIUM BATTERY SAFETY BEFORE AND AFTER THE STORM

By Chief Ken Grimes, PSFRD

Ask someone to picture a firefighter at work, and they will likely imagine a house fire, a vehicle crash, or a hurricane rescue. While those emergencies remain central to our work, your special fire district is equally committed to preparing for next-generation hazards. One of the fastest-growing challenges in today's fire service stems from an everyday household technology: lithium-ion batteries.

A generation ago, most homes contained only a few rechargeable batteries. Today, they power cordless drills, lawn equipment, golf carts, e-bikes, smartphones, tablets, flashlights, and portable power stations. These devices have transformed how we live and work, offering exceptional convenience and safety under normal conditions. However, when damaged, lithium-ion batteries present a fire hazard unlike traditional household threats.

Unlike ordinary fires, a damaged lithium-ion battery can enter thermal runaway—a rapid chain reaction that produces intense heat, toxic smoke, and flammable gases. These fires burn exceptionally hot and can reignite hours after appearing to be extinguished. Fire departments across the nation are responding to these incidents with increasing frequency, prompting continuous investment in specialized equipment, tactics, and response procedures.

On Florida's barrier islands, hurricane season adds a critical layer of risk. Batteries exposed to floodwaters—particularly saltwater—may show no immediate signs of damage and may even continue to operate. Unfortunately, internal corrosion can trigger a catastrophic failure hours or days later as residents clean up, charge tools, or restore power.

Fortunately, proactive measures can significantly reduce these risks. To prepare ahead of a storm, fully charge essential devices before the weather degrades, then store all batteries, cordless tools, and equipment in a cool, dry space above potential flood levels. Be sure to unplug devices as soon as they reach full charge, and move larger battery-powered equipment—such as e-bikes, golf carts, and lawn tools—completely out of areas vulnerable to storm surge.

Following a storm, never attempt to recharge or plug in any battery that was submerged in water or physically damaged. Carefully inspect your devices and watch for warning signs of failure, including swelling, leakage, excessive heat, hissing or popping sounds, unusual odors, or smoke. If a battery displays any of these symptoms and it is safe to handle, immediately move it outdoors away from structures and flammables, and contact your local solid waste or recycling agency for proper hazardous waste disposal rather than placing it in household trash.

The most effective fire is the one that never happens. Public education and prevention remain vital to our mission. As technology evolves, so do the risks to our community, requiring modern response equipment, continuous firefighter training, and active public awareness.

Your special fire district exists to deliver that high standard of readiness. Whether responding to a structure fire, performing a storm rescue, or helping residents navigate modern hazards, our focus remains steadfast: protecting lives, property, and the community we are privileged to serve.

TWO CLAWS UP! Stone crab season is back, running from October 15th through May 1st, and Frenchy's Original Café is ready to celebrate. The 45-year-old Clearwater Beach staple, located at 41 Baymont Street, will host its 42nd annual Stone Crab Weekend Block Party on October 23rd and 24th.

The free-to-attend two-day celebration will run from noon–10 p.m. Friday and Saturday, offering fresh stone crab, live music, and plenty of coastal fun. Food, drinks, and merchandise will be available for purchase.

Parking is available nearby at North Beach Parking Plaza, which offers more than 600 spaces. Visitors may also use public street parking and metered lots near the festival. Taxis, ride-sharing services, and public transportation are additional options.

Those who want to escape the beach crowds without missing the celebration can head north to Frenchy's Stone Crab & Seafood Market, located at 501 Causeway Boulevard on the Dunedin Causeway. CLOSED, BUT NOT FOR GOOD Monstah Lobstah & JD's Back Porch, located at 125 Gulf Boulevard in Indian Rocks Beach, closed last month as its owners prepare to rebuild the property from the ground up.

Like many businesses along Florida's Gulf Coast, the building sustained significant damage during the 2024 hurricane season. After extensive evaluations and discussions with contractors and architects, the owners concluded that additional repairs would only continue a cycle of temporary fixes without addressing the property's underlying problems.

The new Monstah Lobstah will be a multilevel restaurant designed specifically for a coastal environment. The building will include stairs and an elevator.

The rooftop will become JD's Rooftop Bar, bringing back many of the features guests loved about JD's, including live music, dancing, and piano nights. With 360-degree views of the beach and Intracoastal Waterway, the rooftop will also display historic photographs, preserved pieces from the original JD's, and a few surprises celebrating the property's history.

During construction, guests are invited to visit the company's sister restaurants: The Original Crabby Bill's, Guilty Sea Sports Pub, Jake's Coastal Cantina, and Pipo N Betty's Bakery. Follow Monstah Lobstah on Facebook for construction updates.

THE HIDDEN HITS: WHAT CTE RESEARCH MEANS FOR ATHLETES AND FAMILIES

By Pete Magnani, Publisher

Football fields and hockey rinks have long been places where young athletes learn teamwork, discipline, and resilience. But growing evidence about chronic traumatic encephalopathy, better known as CTE, is changing how leagues, coaches, and parents think about the repeated hits that come with collision sports.

CTE is a progressive brain disease associated with long-term exposure to repeated head impacts. Those impacts include diagnosed concussions, but also smaller blows that may produce no immediate symptoms. Over time, abnormal deposits of a protein called tau can damage brain tissue. Researchers have linked CTE pathology with problems involving memory, thinking, mood, and behavior, although those symptoms can have many other causes. At present, CTE can be definitively diagnosed only after death through examination of brain tissue.

A study published in The BMJ in August provides one of the clearest estimates yet of the disease among former National Football League players. Researchers identified 878 former NFL players who died from 2016 through 2021. Of the 235 whose brains were donated for study, 215—more than 91 percent—had CTE.

That does not mean 91 percent of all NFL players develop the disease. Families who suspect neurological problems may be more likely to donate a loved one's brain, creating what researchers call selection bias. To address that limitation, the study calculated a conservative minimum: even if none of the players whose brains were not studied had CTE, at least 24.5 percent of all former NFL players who died during those six years had the disease. The true rate could be considerably higher. Severe, Stage IV CTE was also associated with an increased risk of dementia among the brain donors.

Football is not alone. CTE has been identified in participants in boxing, rugby, soccer, and other activities involving repeated impacts. A 2024 JAMA Network Open study examined the brains of 77 deceased male ice hockey players, from youth competitors to professionals. Researchers found CTE in 42 of them, including 27 of 28 former professional players. After accounting for factors such as age, position, other contact sports, and reported concussions, the odds of CTE increased with each additional year of hockey played.

Those numbers also require caution. The hockey sample was small, limited to male brain donors and was not representative of everyone who plays the sport. The study cannot tell a family the absolute risk facing one particular child. Still, its dose-response pattern—more years of exposure associated with more disease—reinforces the central concern: cumulative contact matters.

That message is especially important in youth sports, where exposure to routine impacts can begin years before college or professional play. CDC research involving players ages 6 to 14 found that tackle football athletes sustained 15 times as many head impacts and 23 times as many high-magnitude impacts as flag football players during practices and games. The point is not that every hit causes lasting harm, or that every contact-sport athlete will develop CTE. Scientists still do not know why some exposed athletes develop the disease and others do not. The practical goal is to reduce avoidable impacts while preserving the benefits of sports participation.

Football programs are responding by offering flag football at younger ages, limiting full-contact practice, teaching age-appropriate tackling that keeps the head out of contact, and enforcing penalties for targeting or leading with the helmet. The NFL has also changed kickoff rules, penalized improper use of the helmet, tested helmets, and added unaffiliated medical personnel to help identify possible concussions. No helmet, however, can prevent the brain from moving inside the skull, so equipment should be viewed as one layer of protection rather than a guarantee.

Hockey has taken similar steps. USA Hockey delayed legal body checking until age 13 and strengthened penalties for head contact. At the professional level, the NHL uses in-arena and central concussion spotters who can require a player to be removed for evaluation after visible signs of a possible brain injury. Reducing checking, fighting, and dangerous contact—and teaching players to respect rather than exploit vulnerable positions—can decrease exposure at every level.

Florida law adds another layer of protection for organized youth teams. Programs must educate coaches, athletes, and parents about concussion risks, obtain annual informed consent, immediately remove a player suspected of a concussion, and require written medical clearance before that athlete returns. The Florida High School Athletic Association also requires annual concussion education for student-athletes and coaches.

Parents should ask whether a league limits contact in practice, trains coaches in concussion recognition, enforces head-contact rules, and follows a gradual return-to-play protocol. Warning signs after a hit can include headache, dizziness, confusion, balance problems, nausea, sensitivity to light or noise, and unusual behavior. A suspected concussion should never be treated as something to "shake off," and an athlete should not return the same day.

Sports will always carry risk, but tradition does not require ignoring new evidence. The most responsible path is neither panic nor complacency. It is to reduce unnecessary blows, recognize injuries quickly, and put a young athlete's long-term brain health ahead of the next play, shift, or game.

CLEARWATER BOY SAVES TURTLES

By Pete Magnani, Publisher

Jessica and Gabe Williams

Twelve-year-old Gabriel "Gabe" Williams expected to spend his summer exploring the beach and building sandcastles near his family's condominium at the Regatta Beach Club on North Clearwater Beach. Instead, his curiosity helped save dozens of sea turtle hatchlings.

On July 20th, Gabe discovered hatchlings trapped inside a storm drain near the Clearwater property's Sunset Pier. The drain, approximately three feet below the surrounding pavers, had become a dangerous trap for the tiny turtles, which had likely emerged from nearby nests and become disoriented while attempting to reach the Gulf.

Gabe and his mother, Jessica Williams, immediately recognized that the hatchlings needed help. Their efforts drew the attention of resident Ruth Tsarnas, who also works with Clearwater Marine Aquarium's Sea Turtle Stranding Team. Aquarium staff coordinated a professional response, and about 40 hatchlings were released safely back into the Gulf.

Clearwater Marine Aquarium patrols approximately 21 miles of northern Pinellas County shoreline. Teams of trained staff members, interns, and volunteers reach the beach before sunrise seven days a week to look for turtle tracks and evidence of nesting activity. Once a nest is located, it is marked and monitored until the eggs hatch. Team members later examine the nest and record its contents to help determine hatching success. The information collected is reported to the Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission and Pinellas County.

The aquarium also operates a marine animal hospital that rescues, rehabilitates, and releases sick or injured sea turtles. Its veterinary team treats turtles suffering from entanglements, boat strikes, disease, and other potentially life-threatening conditions. Whenever possible, rehabilitated turtles are returned to their natural habitat.

Sea turtles have lived in the world's oceans for more than 100 million years, but their survival remains uncertain. All five species found in Florida are classified as threatened or endangered. The Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission estimates that only about one out of every 1,000 hatchlings survives to adulthood.

Nesting season officially runs from May 1st–October 31st. Hatchlings typically emerge at night and instinctively move toward the brightest horizon, which under natural conditions is the reflection of the moon and stars over the water. Artificial lighting can draw them inland and into streets, parking lots, and drainage systems.

Residents and visitors can help by turning off lights visible from the beach, closing curtains after dark, removing beach furniture and trash, filling holes, and knocking down sandcastles before leaving. Sea turtles and hatchlings should never be handled without authorization. Anyone finding a stranded, injured, or disoriented turtle should call Clearwater Marine Aquarium at (727) 441-1790 or the Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission at (888) 404-3922. For more information, visit CMAquarium.org.

A LINE IN THE SAND: BELLEAIR SHORE'S BEACH BOUNDARY DEBATE

A legal dispute over an erosion control line in Belleair Shore has drawn attention from Belleair Beach residents, Pinellas County officials, and beachfront property owners. The outcome could affect property boundaries, public use of dry sand, and future beach renourishment.

An erosion control line, or ECL, is a fixed boundary established by the state before beach restoration or renourishment. Under Florida law, land seaward of the line is state-owned, while land landward of it belongs to private upland owners. It generally replaces the naturally shifting mean high-water line as the boundary between public and private property.

The disputed ECL was recorded in 1997 as part of the Sand Key Phase IV beach restoration project. Belleair Shore petitioned the Florida Department of Environmental Protection (DEP) in 2026 to cancel the portion within the town. The town maintains the line was improperly applied because Belleair Shore did not participate in the project and has not allowed publicly funded sand to be placed directly along its beachfront.

Supporters describe the matter as a private-property rights issue. They argue that retaining the ECL prevents beachfront deeds from extending toward the Gulf as sand naturally accumulates. More than 70 percent of the affected beachfront footage supported the request. Officials say cancellation would correct an error made nearly three decades ago.

Opponents, including some Belleair Beach residents and several local governments, view the issue differently. They contend that Belleair Shore has benefited indirectly because sand placed on nearby beaches migrates along the shoreline. They also worry that removing the line could expand private claims over portions of the dry-sand beach, potentially affecting space available for public walking and recreation.

Opponents also argue that eliminating one section of a larger ECL could complicate future planning, increase costs, and affect eligibility for government-supported renourishment. Supporters counter that Belleair Shore has historically remained outside those projects and should not surrender property rights for benefits it did not request.

On June 23rd, the Department of Environmental Protection denied the petition, finding that the original restoration project was completed within the time required by law, that only a portion of the larger ECL could not be canceled independently, and that Belleair Shore had received sand migrating from adjacent project areas.

Belleair Shore subsequently challenged the decision through Florida's administrative process. If the matter proceeds to a formal hearing, an administrative law judge will consider evidence, witness testimony, and legal arguments from the town, DEP, and any parties permitted to intervene. The judge will issue a recommended order, after which the DEP will enter a final agency decision. An affected party may then seek review by the Florida District Court of Appeal. Unless a later ruling changes the outcome, the ECL will remain in place.

PINELLAS RECOVERS

By Commissioner Brian Scott

As I stood beside Melissa Arledge in front of her rebuilt home in Largo, I was reminded why Pinellas Recovers matters so deeply. Two years after Hurricane Milton nearly destroyed her property, Melissa is finally home again—and her joy reflects the resilience we see throughout Pinellas County.

Through our federally funded Pinellas Recovers programs, more than 1,000 households have already been approved for assistance, and dozens of new homes are now under construction. Melissa's home is the first fully reconstructed residence completed, marking an important step in our long-term recovery.

Rebuilding isn't easy, and the process takes time. Our People First programs continue to offer critical support—from major home repairs and full replacements to reimbursement options and opportunities for landlords to restore damaged units at affordable rates.

We're committed to helping residents across Pinellas County return to safe, stable housing and to restoring the communities impacted by the storms. Seeing families like Melissa's begin a new chapter reminds us why this work is so important—and why we'll keep pushing forward until recovery reaches every household that needs it. If your family experienced damage from the 2024 hurricanes, please call (727) 606-3307 or visit Recover.Pinellas.gov for program-related information.

PEACE MEMORIAL MUSIC SERIES CELEBRATES 20 YEARS

Peace Memorial Church's Music Series will celebrate its 20th anniversary during the 2026–2027 season, marking two decades of bringing high-quality, accessible performances to downtown Clearwater.

Under the longtime volunteer leadership of series chair Beth Daniels, a Clearwater attorney and arts advocate, the program has grown into one of the region's most respected concert series. Each season, Peace Memorial's historic sanctuary hosts six to seven programs featuring local and nationally recognized musicians.

Daniels has also served on the Clearwater Arts Alliance Board and The Florida Orchestra board, extending her commitment to community-focused arts programming throughout the region.

The anniversary season will continue that tradition with classical, jazz, chamber, brass, pipe organ, and vocal performances. Over the years, audiences have also enjoyed big bands, renowned soloists, silent films with live accompaniment, and programs incorporating video and other visual elements.

Concerts are offered on a donations-only basis, making live music available to people of all income levels. Community members are invited to help continue that mission by mailing donations to the church and designating them for the music series.

For information about upcoming concerts, anniversary events, or opportunities to support the Peace Memorial Music Series, visit PeaceMemorialPresbyterian.org. Readers may also contact Music Director Tim Belk at (800) 479-8846 or Concert Series Chair Beth Daniels at (727) 461-1818.

PINELLAS SCAM ALERT: KNOW THE WARNING SIGNS

By Lora Magnani, Publisher

Florida living means sunshine, beaches, and vibrant communities, but the state also faces a serious fraud problem. According to the Federal Trade Commission's 2024 Consumer Sentinel Network Data Book, Florida had the nation's highest per-capita rates of reported fraud and identity theft. Here in Pinellas County, law enforcement and consumer protection officials continue to warn residents about increasingly convincing schemes designed to steal money and personal information.

One of the most prevalent schemes involves scammers impersonating law enforcement officers. The Pinellas County Sheriff's Office confirmed in March that residents had received calls from criminals using the name of a real high-ranking Sheriff's Office official. The callers claimed their targets had outstanding warrants, unpaid citations, or penalties for missing jury duty. They then demanded immediate payment through Zelle, Cash App, Venmo, or gift cards.

Scammers can manipulate caller ID so that a call appears to come from the Sheriff's Office. They may also provide a real deputy's name, a fabricated badge number, or convincing personal details. None of that proves the call is legitimate. The Pinellas County Sheriff's Office will never call someone and demand money to resolve a warrant, citation, or missed jury summons. Anyone receiving such a call should hang up and contact the Sheriff's Office directly at (727) 582-6200.

Fraudsters are also impersonating utility companies and county agencies. Utility scammers typically threaten to disconnect electricity, water, cable, or another service unless the customer makes an immediate payment. Residents should never use a payment link or telephone number supplied in an unexpected message. Instead, contact the company through the number printed on a bill or listed on its official website.

In July, Pinellas County Animal Services and the Office of Consumer Protection warned residents about a caller posing as an animal control officer. The scammer claimed the victim's pet was undergoing surgery and demanded immediate payment over the telephone. Caller ID could even display what appeared to be an official county number. Pinellas County Animal Services does not provide veterinary services to the public, making such a request a clear warning sign.

Other scammers pose as representatives of Medicare, insurance companies, government benefits programs, banks, or credit card issuers. Their goal is often to obtain Social Security numbers, Medicare numbers, birth dates, account information, passwords, or verification codes. Once criminals obtain this information, they may open fraudulent accounts, apply for loans, change insurance coverage, or gain access to existing bank accounts.

Artificial intelligence is making impersonation scams more convincing. Criminals can copy a person's voice from a video or audio clip posted online, then use the imitation to create an emergency. Hearing a familiar voice is no longer proof that the caller is genuine. If someone claiming to be a relative requests money, hang up and call that person directly at a known number. Avoid saying the relative's name first, because doing so may give the scammer useful information. A family code word can provide another safeguard, but residents should still verify every unexpected request before sending money or sharing information.

Grandparent and family-emergency scams remain another serious threat, particularly for older residents. A caller may pretend to be a grandchild who has been arrested, injured in an accident, or stranded while traveling. Another scammer may then join the call while posing as an attorney, police officer, or medical professional. Victims are pressured to send money immediately and told not to contact other family members.

If such a call arrives, hang up and contact the relative directly using a telephone number you already know. Speaking with another family member can also quickly expose the deception. Families may want to establish a private code word that can be used to confirm someone's identity during a genuine emergency.

Home repair and contractor scams are a concern for Pinellas County homeowners, particularly after hurricanes or flooding. Fraudulent operators may arrive without being invited, claim to have leftover materials, exaggerate damage, or demand a deposit before disappearing. Others may begin work without permits, insurance, or the licenses required for the job, leaving homeowners responsible for unfinished repairs, code violations, or damage.

Before signing a contract, verify the contractor's license through the Pinellas County Construction Licensing Board or the Florida Department of Business and Professional Regulation. Ask for proof of general liability and workers' compensation insurance, check the company's complaint history, and obtain multiple written estimates. A legitimate contractor should provide an agreement describing the work, materials, total price, payment schedule, and expected completion date.

Avoid paying the full amount in advance and never allow anyone to pressure you into making an immediate decision. Payments should correspond with completed stages of work. Homeowners should also confirm that required permits have been obtained and request releases of lien from contractors, subcontractors, and suppliers before making final payment. Anyone suspecting unlicensed contracting can contact the Pinellas County Construction Licensing Board at (727) 582-6767. Consumer complaints may be reported to Pinellas County Consumer Protection.

The best defense is to slow down. Scammers rely on fear, secrecy, and urgency to prevent people from thinking clearly. Never provide personal or financial information to an unexpected caller, and never send gift cards, cryptocurrency, wire transfers, cash, or payments through mobile apps in response to threats or pressure.

Residents can also place a free credit freeze with Equifax, Experian, and TransUnion. A freeze makes it more difficult for an identity thief to open new accounts, although it does not prevent fraudulent activity involving existing accounts.

Anyone who suspects fraud should contact the bank, credit card company, or payment service involved as quickly as possible. Suspected scams may be reported to Pinellas County Consumer Protection at (727) 464-6200, the Pinellas County Sheriff's Office non-emergency line at (727) 582-6200, or the Federal Trade Commission at ReportFraud.ftc.gov. Identity theft victims can report the crime and receive a personalized recovery plan at IdentityTheft.gov.

Staying informed, verifying unexpected requests, and checking on vulnerable relatives and neighbors can help prevent these criminals from succeeding.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN AND HIS THREE PARTIES

By Bob Griffin, Contributing Historian

With the 2026 midterm elections approaching, it is timely to examine how American political parties have changed. Florida's major parties are Republican and Democratic. No party affiliation (NPA) is distinct from membership in the minor Independent Party of Florida. Florida also recognizes minor parties, including the America First Party, Ecology Party, Green Party, Independent Party, Libertarian Party, and We the People Florida.

Abraham Lincoln is remembered as the first Republican president, but his career began elsewhere. He supported the National Republicans, served as a Whig, helped establish the Republican Party in Illinois, and sought reelection under the temporary National Union banner.

Early Steps and Local Defeat

In 1832, 23-year-old store clerk Abraham Lincoln announced his candidacy for the Illinois General Assembly. Party labels carried less weight in that race, although Lincoln supported National Republican policies associated with Henry Clay. His campaign was interrupted when he volunteered for the Black Hawk War. Elected captain of his militia company, Lincoln later recalled the honor with pride, although his unit never saw combat.

After returning, Lincoln resumed campaigning. He finished eighth among 13 candidates, with the top four winning seats. Although he performedwell in his New Salem precinct, he lacked sufficient support throughout Sangamon County. It was his first electoral defeat.

The Whig Party

Lincoln tried again in 1834, aligning with the emerging Whig Party. He won a seat in the Illinois House and was reelected in 1836, 1838, and 1840. During four terms, Lincoln became a Whig minority leader and supported roads, canals, and railroads. He also helped move Illinois' capital from Vandalia to Springfield.

In 1846, Lincoln was elected to the U.S. House as a Whig, representing Illinois' 7th Congressional District. His single term proved politically challenging. Lincoln opposed President James K. Polk's handling of the Mexican-American War and introduced his "Spot Resolutions," asking where Mexican forces had allegedly shed American blood. His position drew criticism. Lincoln did not seek reelection in 1848, honoring an informal Whig arrangement rotating the nomination among party leaders. He returned to Springfield and resumed practicing law.

The 1854 Kansas-Nebraska Act ended Lincoln's political hiatus. It allowed territorial residents to decide whether to permit slavery, effectively repealing a Missouri Compromise restriction. Opposing slavery's westward expansion, Lincoln returned to politics. He won election to the Illinois House in 1854 but resigned before taking his seat to pursue the U.S. Senate.

At the time, state legislatures—not voters—selected U.S. senators. In February 1855, Lincoln led several rounds of voting but lacked a majority. When divisions among anti-slavery lawmakers threatened to elect another candidate, Lincoln asked supporters to back anti-slavery Democrat Lyman Trumbull, who won.

The Republican Party

As the Whig Party collapsed over slavery, Lincoln joined the new Republican Party. In 1856, he finished second in informal balloting for its vice-presidential nomination, which went to William L. Dayton. Two years later, Illinois Republicans selected Lincoln to challenge Democratic Senator Stephen A. Douglas. Their campaign produced seven debates focused largely on slavery's expansion into western territories.

statewide support, but district boundaries and results favored Douglas' allies. The Illinois General Assembly reelected Douglas 54–46. Although Lincoln lost, the debates made him a nationally recognized Republican leader.

In May 1860, the Republican National Convention met in Chicago. Lincoln emerged as an acceptable alternative to front-runner William H. Seward and secured the nomination on the third ballot. That November, Lincoln faced three major opponents in a nation divided over slavery. He became the first Republican president, winning 180 of 303 electoral votes despite receiving 39.8 percent of the popular vote.

The National Union Party

Four years later, Republicans joined pro-Union Democrats under the temporary National Union Party banner. Lincoln sought reelection with Tennessee Democrat Andrew Johnson as his running mate. Facing Democratic nominee George B. McClellan, a former Union general, Lincoln won approximately 55 percent of the popular vote and 212 electoral votes.

Lincoln's journey—from National Republican supporter to Whig, Republican, and National Union candidate—reflected the political changes of his lifetime. John Wilkes Booth shot Lincoln at Ford's Theatre on April 14th, 1865, six weeks after his second term began. Lincoln died the following morning, April 15th.

NEWS FROM THE PUBLIC WORKS

Why Is Stormwater Important? National Pollutant Discharge Elimination System

If stormwater only contained rain, our jobs would be simple. But stormwater contains more. Much more! Pollutants such as oils, fertilizers, pesticides, herbicides, lawn clippings, paints and other household chemicals, chlorine and even soil are picked up and carried along by stormwater as it travels across lawns and other surfaces, down roadside curbs, into storm drains, and ultimately into larger water bodies such as McKay Creek and the Intracoastal Waterway that leads directly to the Gulf of Mexico. It is illegal to discharge chlorinated pool water into the curb lines and roadways.

What can you do?

- Please be sure to call Belleair Bluffs City Hall at 727-584-2151 if you notice anyone performing illicit discharge activities.
- Properly dispose of hazardous materials. Please visit our website at www.belleairbluffs.org to keep up with dates and locations of mobile collection events by the Pinellas County Household Electronics and Chemical Collection Center.
- Prevent illicit discharges (items other than rain) by containing soil piles on construction sites and de-chlorinating swimming pool water before draining.

EVEN AFTER SUMMER, KEEP KIDS OUT OF HOT CARS

From the Desk of Sheriff Bob Gualtieri

You see it in the headlines every year—a child has died after being left in a hot car. And you think, how could that possibly happen? Who could forget a precious child in the car on a hot day? According to the National Safety Council, 31 children died of vehicular heatstroke in 2025. Since 1998, more than 120 children in Florida have died after being left in a hot car. Only Texas has more child heatstroke deaths in vehicles. Every single one of those deaths could have been prevented.

The inside of a vehicle heats up much faster than you may realize. According to No Heat Stroke, an organization dedicated to preventing heat-related deaths in cars, when the outside temperature is 90 degrees, the internal temperature can climb to 133 degrees within an hour. But the danger doesn't end when temperatures start to drop a little as fall approaches. Even balmy fall temperatures are enough to heat up a car to dangerous levels. In 80-degree weather, the interior can rise to 123 degrees in an hour. When it is a cool and pleasant 70 degrees outside, a car parked in the sun can heat up to 113 degrees.

Heatstroke can begin when core body temperature reaches 104 degrees. Death can occur when it reaches 107 degrees. Because of their smaller size and greater surface-to-mass ratio, children's bodies can heat up three to five times faster than an adult's.

It isn't enough to leave the windows cracked. That little bit of air circulation does almost nothing to counteract the effects of the sun heating up the car. Parking in the shade might make it a little cooler, but dropping the internal temperature from the 130s to the 120s isn't going to prevent loss of life. Some people think it will be okay if they're just running inside for a few minutes, but the temperature can go from warm to deadly fast. There is no such thing as a safe amount of time to leave a child in a hot car.

Sometimes relatives or babysitters leave kids in the car deliberately because they don't realize how dangerous it is. Other times, people actually forget to take their child out of the car. They may be distracted, exhausted, or think that another caregiver has already taken them out. A baby may be quietly sleeping and overlooked while getting other children out of the car.

Always check the back of your vehicle. When you put a child in the back seat, find a way to remind yourself that they are there. Put something in the back seat that you'll need at your destination.

Some vehicle heatstroke deaths occur when children gain access to a vehicle themselves and become trapped without their parents knowing. Make sure your vehicle is locked, and don't let children have access to the keys. Teach them that the car is not a place to play. As soon as they are old enough, teach them how to open the back doors, and that they can climb to the front and open the front doors if the back doors have a child safety lock. Make sure they know to blow the horn if they get trapped. If a child is ever missing, check the pool first, then the car.

Pets are also extremely vulnerable to vehicular heatstroke, and many people think that it is safe to leave an animal in a car for a brief period. In reality, thousands of pets die each year from being left in hot cars.

If you see a child or animal left alone in a hot vehicle, call 911 immediately.

SHEPHERD'S VILLAGE

Submitted by Sherry Chandler

For 35 years, Shepherd's Village has helped single moms and their children face the future with confidence. Our founder, Dr. Phyllis Alderman, had a heart for single moms and a whole lot of faith. The first Shepherd's Village began in Clearwater after the equity in an apartment building was famously signed over on a napkin. But the story didn't end there.

When it was time to find a safer home for the mothers and children, Phyllis took another big step of faith. Shepherd's Village purchased its Belleair Bluffs property with just $60 in the bank, allowing the resident families to move from Clearwater.

On Sunday, October 25th, we're hosting a Village Party to celebrate our founder, thank the Village of supporters who helped us reach this milestone, raise a glass to 35 years, and show off a building that recently received a fabulous facelift.

If you drive past 3025 Los Altos Avenue in Belleair Bluffs from 4 to 6 p.m. on October 25th, give us a honk! One honk says, "Happy 35th!" Two honks say, "Looking good, Shepherd's Village!" Honk three times, and we'll assume you're just excited.

If honking isn't quite enough, consider donating $60 at ShepherdsVillage.com/donate. We've seen what God can do with $60. Give in honor of the faith-filled step that helped bring Shepherd's Village—and its families—home to Belleair Bluffs.

Because 35 years later, one thing hasn't changed: It really does take a Village.

WHY FALL IS THE BEST TIME TO LANDSCAPE IN BELLEAIR

By Randy Lee, Landscape Designer

Fall in Belleair may not bring colorful leaves or chilly mornings, but October does bring something valuable for homeowners: a break from the intense heat and humidity of summer. That makes fall one of the best times to evaluate, refresh, and improve your landscape.

Cooler Weather Is Better for New Plantings

October's milder temperatures give newly planted trees, shrubs, and other plants a chance to establish healthy root systems before Florida's summer heat returns. Fall is an ideal time to add new plants, create planting beds or make larger landscape improvements. Beautiful flowers can also be planted prior to the holidays.

Give Your Landscape a Post-Summer Refresh

After months of heat, heavy rain, and tropical weather, your landscape may need some attention. Overgrown plants, damaged trees, tired planting beds, and inefficient irrigation are all worth evaluating before the dry season arrives. Then, you can decide whether a refresh or a full-scale renovation is needed.

Check Your Irrigation

As rainfall becomes less consistent, your irrigation system becomes increasingly important. Fall is a good time to check for broken heads, uneven coverage, and areas that may be receiving too much or too little water. A properly designed irrigation system helps keep your landscape healthy while using water efficiently. We are also currently under water restrictions.

Prepare for Outdoor Living

Cooler temperatures also mean more time spent outdoors. Whether you are entertaining around the pool, enjoying your outdoor kitchen, or simply relaxing in your backyard, fall is the perfect time to enhance the spaces surrounding your home. New plantings, landscape lighting, outdoor speakers, privacy screening, and updated beds can make a significant difference in how your outdoor spaces look and function. Everyone wants to look great for the upcoming holidays.

Plan Now for the Landscape You Want Tomorrow

A beautiful landscape takes time to mature. Trees grow, shrubs fill in and planting beds become more established. Starting your project in the fall gives your landscape time to develop before the next summer season. It all starts with a 2D or 3D design.

Fall Landscape Checklist

- Prepare for dry season
- Water restrictions are in effect
- Fertilizer can be used as of October 1st
- Resod when weather cools off
- Chill out on maintenance and pruning
- Prepare a new landscape design

Landscapes By Randy Lee, Inc. is a full-service landscape design company here to help you with all of your landscape needs. Call us directly at (727) 421-2715 or visit us online at LandscapesbyRL.com.

THE FINAL ESCAPE: THE CONFEDERACY'S LAST WAR SECRETARY AND HIS FLIGHT THROUGH FLORIDA

By Pete Magnani, Publisher

On May 30th, 1865, as the Civil War drew to its bitter conclusion, one of the Confederacy's highest-ranking leaders navigated the waters of Florida's Indian River Lagoon, hoping to evade capture and escape the United States. His remarkable journey would become one of the most dramatic escape stories of the Civil War.

John Cabell Breckinridge had already lived an extraordinary life before arriving in Florida. Born in Kentucky in 1821, he entered public office in 1849. During his two terms in Congress, Breckinridge aligned with moderate Southern Democrats, favoring states' rights while advocating to keep the Union together. Presidential nominee James Buchanan named Breckinridge as his running mate in 1856. On March 4th, 1857, Breckinridge was sworn in as the 14th Vice President of the United States—the youngest person ever elected to the office.

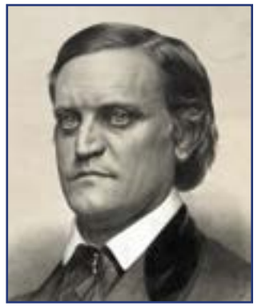
As Vice President, Breckinridge presided over an increasingly divided Senate. While he personally supported the rights of slaveholders, he frequently attempted to mediate growing sectional tensions between Northern and Southern senators. However, his relationship with President Buchanan soured over policy differences and patronage disputes. Breckinridge ran for President on the Southern Democratic ticket and lost to Abraham Lincoln by 108 electoral votes.

Following the loss, Breckinridge took a seat in the U.S. Senate representing Kentucky in March 1861. As the Civil War broke out, he urged compromise and argued against Northern military intervention in the seceding states. Although Breckinridge sympathized with the South, he initially hoped Kentucky could remain neutral in the conflict. In August 1861, he delivered one of his final Senate speeches urging reconciliation and warning against a devastating war.

Kentucky's position became increasingly complicated as the state attempted to remain in the Union while divided between Unionists and Confederate sympathizers. In September 1861, the Kentucky legislature voted to support the Union cause, and federal forces sought to arrest Breckinridge for treason. He fled south, joined the Confederate Army, and was formally expelled from the U.S. Senate on December 4th, 1861.

The expulsion was one of the most dramatic moments of the Civil War's early political crisis and marked a dramatic fall from grace. Only months earlier, Breckinridge had been one of the nation's most prominent political figures—a former vice president and presidential candidate. By the end of 1861, he was officially branded a traitor by the Senate and was serving as a Confederate general. He would later rise to the rank of major general and, in February 1865, become Confederate Secretary of War, placing him among the final leaders of the collapsing Confederacy.

By the spring of 1865, the Confederacy had collapsed. Richmond had fallen, General Robert E. Lee had surrendered at Appomattox, and Confederate armies across the South were laying down their arms. Unlike some Confederate leaders who still hoped to continue the struggle, Breckinridge recognized that the Confederacy had been defeated and urged President Jefferson Davis to disband the government and spare the South further suffering. Davis refused, and the Confederate government continued its desperate flight southward until Davis was captured in Georgia on May 10th. Realizing imprisonment was now almost certain, Breckinridge resolved to flee the country.



Traveling in disguise with a small group of loyal companions, Breckinridge crossed into Florida in mid-May. The same rugged landscape that had frustrated Union military operations throughout the war now offered one final avenue of escape.

Near Gainesville, Breckinridge received critical assistance from Colonel John Jackson Dickison, Florida's famed cavalry commander known as the "Swamp Fox of the Confederacy." Dickison supplied the fugitives with a small lifeboat captured from the Union gunboat USS Columbine. Although Breckinridge questioned whether the tiny craft could survive the open ocean, it represented his only hope of freedom.

On May 26th, the small party launched down the St. Johns River toward Florida's east coast. The voyage quickly became an ordeal. Torrential rains soaked the men and ruined much of their food and gunpowder. Mosquitoes descended in overwhelming numbers, and the travelers survived on fish, cornmeal mush, turtle eggs, sweet potatoes, wild limes, and whatever game they could find.

By May 30th, the fugitives reached Carlisle's Landing on the Indian River Lagoon near present-day Titusville. Breckinridge was astonished to discover that the "Indian River" was not a river at all but an immense coastal lagoon stretching more than 150 miles behind Florida's barrier islands. As the group paddled south, they traveled through what are now Brevard, Indian River, St. Lucie, Martin, and Palm Beach counties—then an isolated wilderness patrolled by scattered Union guard posts and naval vessels.

One night, they silently slipped past a Union guard station near Fort Pierce, muffling their oars as they glided through darkness. Near Jupiter, local Confederate sympathizers helped the party obtain a larger vessel better suited for the open-water voyage to Cuba, replacing the tiny lifeboat that had carried them down Florida's coast. After dragging the vessel across the narrow barrier island and entering the Atlantic Ocean, they encountered rough seas that repeatedly forced them south instead of east toward the Bahamas.

Even then, the dangers continued. Food and fresh water dwindled, violent storms threatened to swamp the vessel, and the exhausted travelers faced constant uncertainty. Finally, on June 11th, 1865, they reached Cárdenas, Cuba, bringing an end to one of the most extraordinary escapes of the postwar era. Breckinridge later lived in Britain, Canada, and Europe before returning to Kentucky in 1869 to quietly resume his law practice. He never sought a presidential pardon, instead relying on general amnesty eventually extended to most former Confederates after federal restrictions eased.

Today, motorists crossing bridges over the Indian River Lagoon or visiting communities such as Titusville, Fort Pierce, and Jupiter are traveling waterways that once carried the Confederacy's highest-ranking remaining official toward exile. Breckinridge's escape was not a final battle or military triumph, but the closing act of the Confederate government itself. It remains one of Florida's most remarkable—and least remembered—Civil War stories.

ALPHA-GAL WOMEN'S RETREAT

Soul Quest Healing Horizons Foundation, Inc., a Tampa Bay-area 501(c)(3) nonprofit, will host its inaugural Alpha-Gal Women's Educational Healing Retreat November 6th–8th, 2026, at the Sheraton Sand Key Resort on Clearwater Beach.

The retreat is designed for women living with alpha-gal syndrome, a potentially serious allergy to alpha-gal, a sugar found in most mammals. The condition can develop following certain tick bites and may cause reactions to mammalian meat and other products containing alpha-gal.

Living with the condition can make everyday activities such as dining out, traveling, and attending social gatherings difficult. The retreat will give women an opportunity to learn, relax, and connect with others who understand those challenges.

The weekend will feature meals prepared specifically for the retreat by the resort's culinary team, educational speakers, wellness experiences, gifts, snacks, beachfront activities, and opportunities for fellowship. The retreat package also includes hotel accommodations and scheduled programming.

The event supports the foundation's broader mission of increasing awareness of alpha-gal syndrome, creating safer travel opportunities, and helping bridge the educational gap between patients and the hospitality and travel industries.

For registration details and current promotional pricing, visit SoulQuestTravel.info.
